

Where Bet365 is legal: state-by-state

Is Bet365 legal in the USA in 2026 — a state-by-state guide to availability, geolocation rules, age limits and how to check if you can bet legally.

Nathan Brooks, Sports Betting Editor · 16.05.2026

TL;DR "Is Bet365 legal in the USA?" has a state-by-state answer, not a yes or no. It is legal and available in the states where it holds a license, and not an option elsewhere — and crucially, a state-licensed Bet365 is a completely different thing from the unlicensed offshore sites that use similar names to target Americans. This guide takes the consumer's view: the legal framework of federal versus state law, the live states, exactly how to check whether you can bet, what happens when you travel, how to stay informed as the map changes, and why offshore sites that "accept everyone" are not a safe substitute when Bet365 is not in your state. The footprint changes, so the official Bet365 site for your location is always the definitive source.

The legal framework

Sports betting in the US is governed by state law, not a single federal rule. Since the 2018 Supreme Court decision, each state decides for itself, which is why availability varies so much.

To understand whether Bet365 is legal for you, you have to understand the structure of US betting law. For decades a federal law effectively banned most sports betting nationwide. In 2018, the Supreme Court struck that ban down, but it did not legalize betting everywhere — it returned the decision to the states. Each state now chooses whether to allow sports betting, whether to permit it online or only in person, and how to regulate it. There is no overarching federal license or national sportsbook.

The result is a genuine patchwork. Some states have embraced online betting with competitive, multi-operator markets; some allow only in-person wagering at casinos; and some have not legalized it at all. Within the legal states, each regulator sets its own rules on age, permitted sports, and bet types. So the federal picture (betting is permitted, but states decide) and the state picture (each one different) together explain why "is Bet365 legal?" depends entirely on where you are.

For Bet365 specifically, this framework means it operates only where two things are true: the state has legalized online sports betting, and Bet365 has obtained a license there. Where both hold, it is a fully legal, regulated option on equal footing with the other licensed books. Where either is missing — no state legalization, or no Bet365 license — it is simply not available, and that is the law working as intended rather than a gap to be exploited.

- 2018 decision: ended the federal ban, returned the choice to states
- State-by-state: each decides whether and how to allow betting
- No federal license: no single national sportsbook exists
- Bet365 needs both: state legalization and a Bet365 license

The federal-then-state framework is why availability varies, so Bet365 is legal only where a state has legalized betting and licensed it.

US betting law is state-by-state since the 2018 federal-ban repeal, so Bet365 is legal only where a state has legalized online betting and licensed it.

Live states

Bet365 is live in a growing group of states, led by early markets New Jersey and Colorado. The exact roster shifts as it adds licenses, so treat any list as a snapshot, not a permanent record.

Bet365's availability has grown steadily since its 2019 New Jersey launch. Colorado was another early market, and it has since expanded into a range of additional states — among them Virginia, Ohio, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Indiana, Arizona, Tennessee and North Carolina at various points. These are states that legalized online betting and where Bet365 secured a license, reflecting a deliberate, market-by-market expansion rather than a single nationwide rollout.

The honest caveat is that any list is a snapshot. The footprint changes as new states legalize and as Bet365 pursues fresh licenses, so a roster that is current today may be incomplete or outdated in a season. We name well-established markets like New Jersey and Colorado with confidence, but we treat the broader list as indicative — useful for understanding the kind of states Bet365 operates in, not as a permanent, exhaustive directory you should rely on for a definitive answer.

This is exactly why the most useful tool is not a list at all but the live check described in the next section. A static page cannot keep pace with a changing market, whereas opening the app from your location gives you the operator's own real-time answer for your specific state. Think of the named states here as context and the live check as the authority, and you will never be caught out by an availability that has changed since a guide was written.

- Early markets: New Jersey (2019) and Colorado
- Among others: Virginia, Ohio, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Indiana, Arizona, Tennessee, North Carolina
- A snapshot: the roster shifts as licenses are added
- Live check is authority: the app gives the real-time answer

Bet365 is live in a growing set of states, but since the list changes, use the named markets as context and the live check as your definitive answer.

Bet365 operates in a growing group of states led by New Jersey and Colorado, but the roster shifts, so the live check is the authoritative source.

How to check eligibility

The most reliable way to know if you can bet is to open the Bet365 app or site from your location, which runs geolocation and confirms availability. Age and account rules apply alongside the location check.

Checking whether you can legally bet on Bet365 is simple, and it beats relying on any list. Open the Bet365 app or official website while physically in the state where you want to bet. As a licensed operator, it runs a geolocation check using your device's location signals and will tell you immediately whether betting is available where you are. If it is, you can register or log in and bet; if not, the app makes that clear. This live, location-based check is the single most accurate answer for your specific situation.

Alongside the location check, the standard eligibility rules apply. You must be at least 21 years old, the legal age across Bet365's US states. You need a single account registered in your own name, and you will complete identity verification as part of signing up. Payment methods must be in your own name too. None of these are obstacles so much as the normal conditions of a regulated account, and meeting them cleanly is what lets verification and access proceed smoothly.

If the app tells you that you cannot bet when you believe you are in a legal state, that is usually a geolocation issue rather than a true unavailability: grant precise location access, turn location services on, disable any VPN, and ensure a good signal. If, after that, betting is not available, the honest conclusion is that Bet365 is not licensed in your state, and the right response is to use a sportsbook that is — not to look for a workaround that puts you outside the law.

1. Open the app or site from inside your state
2. Let geolocation run and read whether betting is available
3. Confirm you are 21+ and ready to verify your identity
4. Register and bet if available, with a method in your own name

The live geolocation check, plus the standard 21+ and account rules, is the definitive and simplest way to know whether you can legally bet on Bet365.

Open the app from your location to let geolocation confirm availability; combined with the 21+ and own-name account rules, it is the definitive eligibility check.

Betting while traveling

You can manage your Bet365 account anywhere, but you can only place bets from a state where it is licensed. Crossing into an illegal state pauses betting until you return to a legal one.

Travel is where the legal-by-state model becomes tangible. Your Bet365 account is national — one account that follows you across the country, letting you log in, check balances and manage settings from anywhere. But your ability to place a bet is local, governed by the state you are physically in at that moment. This split between a portable account and location-bound betting is the single most important thing for a traveling bettor to understand.

In practice, this means a few clear scenarios. Travel from one legal Bet365 state to another, and you can bet in both, each under its own rules and markets. Travel to a state where Bet365 is unlicensed or where online betting is illegal, and you simply cannot place a new bet there — though your account, funds and any open bets remain intact and accessible. A bet you placed legally before you traveled settles normally regardless of where you are when it concludes, because it was valid where and when you made it.

There is no need to create a new account when you cross state lines; the same account works everywhere, gated by geolocation to wherever you are. The simple traveler's rule is to treat your account as always-on for management and only-when-legal for betting. If you are unsure whether a state you are visiting allows Bet365, the live check answers it instantly — open the app on arrival and it will tell you whether you can bet there.

- Account is portable: manage it from any state
- Betting is location-bound: only wager from a legal state
- Open bets stand: a legally placed bet settles even after you travel
- One account: no need to re-register when crossing state lines

Travel does not affect your account, only where you can bet, so manage it anywhere and wager only from a state where Bet365 is licensed.

Your account works nationwide for management but betting is limited to legal states, so traveling pauses wagering in unlicensed states without affecting your funds.

Staying informed

Because the legal map changes, staying informed means following your state's betting legislation, re-checking the official site, and keeping responsible gaming in view as new options appear.

The US betting map is still evolving, so staying informed pays off, especially if Bet365 is not yet available where you live. New states legalize online betting periodically, and existing operators add licenses, so the answer to "can I bet on Bet365?" can change for you over time. The two things worth tracking are your state's legislative progress on betting and Bet365's availability in your state, both of which point to when a new option might open.

The practical ways to stay current are straightforward. Follow reputable coverage of your state's sports betting legislation, since legalization is the first domino. Periodically open the official Bet365 site or app from your location to see whether it has launched. And rely on the operator's own state pages for the definitive, current status rather than static third-party lists, which fall out of date. A few minutes of checking when you suspect something has changed beats assuming an old answer still holds.

As new betting options appear, keep responsible gaming in view. The arrival of legal betting in a state, or a new operator launching, is a moment to set sensible deposit and time limits from the start rather than after the fact. The same 21+ rule and the same safer-gambling tools apply across every legal state, and the 1-800-GAMBLER helpline is available throughout the US. Staying informed is about more than just availability — it is about entering any new betting option with the right safeguards already in place.

- Track legislation: your state legalizing is the first step
- Re-check the official site: for current Bet365 availability
- Trust official sources: over static third-party lists
- Safer gambling: set limits as new options appear; 1-800-GAMBLER applies

Stay informed by following your state's legislation and re-checking the official site, and bring responsible-gambling habits to any new option that opens.

The legal map changes, so follow your state's legislation and the official site for availability, and set safer-gambling limits as new options appear.

Offshore sites are not the same

Unlicensed offshore sites that use similar names and "accept everyone" are not a safe substitute for a state-licensed Bet365. They lack the regulation, protections and recourse that make legal betting worthwhile.

This is the most important consumer-protection point in the entire guide. If Bet365 is not licensed in your state, you may come across offshore gambling sites that advertise to Americans, sometimes with names or branding designed to look familiar, claiming to accept anyone regardless of state. These are not the same as a state-licensed sportsbook, and treating them as a substitute is a serious mistake. They operate from jurisdictions with no US oversight, are not licensed by any US regulator, and answer to no authority you can appeal to.

The differences are not academic. With a licensed operator, your funds are held under regulated conditions, your identity and money are protected by law, disputes have a real regulator behind them, and responsible-gambling tools are mandated and enforceable. Offshore sites offer none of this: if they withhold a payout, freeze your account, or simply disappear, you have little or no recourse, and there is no regulator to complain to. The "convenience" of accepting you from a banned state comes at the cost of every protection that makes legal betting safe.

Aspect	Licensed Bet365	Offshore site
Regulation	State-licensed and overseen	None applicable to you
Fund protection	Regulated conditions	No real protection
Dispute recourse	State regulator	Effectively none
Safer-gambling tools	Mandated and enforceable	Unreliable or absent

It is worth naming the warning signs of an offshore operation, because they market themselves to look legitimate. Tell-tale signs include accepting customers from any state without a geolocation check, heavy promotion of cryptocurrency deposits, welcome offers that seem implausibly large, no mention of a specific US state regulator, and vague or foreign company registration. A licensed US sportsbook will always gate you by location, name its regulator, and verify your identity — the very "friction" that offshore sites skip is the friction that protects you. If a site lets you bet from a state where you know betting is illegal, that is not a convenience; it is the clearest possible sign it is operating outside the law.

If Bet365 is not legal in your state, the right response is to wait until it is, use another licensed operator that is available, or simply not bet — never to substitute an unlicensed offshore site that strips away every protection legal betting provides.

Unlicensed offshore sites are not a safe substitute for a state-licensed Bet365, lacking the regulation, fund protection and recourse that make legal betting worthwhile.

FAQ

Is Bet365 legal in the USA?

It is legal in the specific states where it holds a sportsbook license, and not available elsewhere. US betting is regulated state by state since the 2018 Supreme Court decision ended the federal ban, so there is no single national answer. Confirm availability for your state on the official Bet365 site.

How do I know if Bet365 is legal where I live?

Open the Bet365 app or official site from your location. As a licensed operator it runs a geolocation check and will tell you immediately whether betting is available in your state. That live check is more reliable than any static list, since the footprint changes as new states launch.

Can I bet on Bet365 when I travel to another state?

You can manage your account from anywhere, but you can only place bets from a state where Bet365 is licensed. Travel between legal states and you can bet in both; travel to a non-legal state and betting pauses until you return. Your account, funds and open bets remain intact throughout.

Are offshore sites a safe alternative if Bet365 is not in my state?

No. Unlicensed offshore sites that accept Americans regardless of state lack US regulation, fund protection, dispute recourse and reliable safer-gambling tools. If a payout is withheld you have little recourse. If Bet365 is not legal where you live, use another licensed operator that is, or wait — do not turn to offshore sites.

Will Bet365 become legal in more states?

Likely, over time. New states legalize online betting periodically, and Bet365 pursues licenses market by market, so its availability grows gradually. If it is not in your state yet, follow your state's betting legislation and re-check the official site periodically to know when it launches.
